... When the new governor [Peter Stuyvesant] arrived in New Amsterdam in 1647 with his wife, his recently widowed sister, and her three children, he was horrified. Instead of streets of gold—as he expected—he saw mud. The walls of Fort Amsterdam were used as grazing fields for a couple of cows. Chickens made their nests under the mouths of the fort’s rusty cannons. Of the three windmills, one could no longer be used, while a second one had burned down. The houses were clumsily built of wood, with thatched roofs and wooden chimneys. The town’s outhouses were set directly on the street, creating unpleasant odors. Pigs wandered about at will, kept out of vegetable gardens only by rough stockades. The church was unfinished. There were 150 dwellings and one quarter of them were taverns. There was drunkenness and fighting in the streets, even on the Sabbath [day of worship] which was supposed to be a day of quiet and prayer. Stuyvesant had a lot to do. . . .

. . . Peter set to work. He told the people what they could and could not do. He closed the taverns at nine o’clock every evening. He fined people for fighting in the streets. He said that pigs must be kept behind fences, and that outhouses must be removed from the streets.

Walking along the streets of New Amsterdam was dangerous because people drove their carts and horses too fast. Peter made a new law. He said the drivers must get down from their carts and lead their horses. They could only ride through town on the street now called Broadway. Even on Broadway, he set a speed limit. . . .

Peter Stuyvesant passed laws to improve life in New Amsterdam. Fires were a problem. The people were told to get rid of thatched roofs, wooden chimneys, and haystacks because they could cause fires. He appointed fire wardens to check to be sure the fire laws were being followed. Buckets were filled with water to put on the fires. A tax of one beaver skin was used to pay for the buckets. This was how Peter Stuyvesant created the first fire department in America.

While Stuyvesant was governor, the town built a hospital and a post office. A home was set up for orphans. A school was built so that students did not have to go to classes in one of the taverns.

In 1653, war broke out between England and Holland. Stuyvesant met with his council to make plans to defend New Amsterdam. They agreed that repairs needed to be made to the fort. A wall was built along the northern edge of the town. The wall was made of wood. It was twelve feet high and had a sloping platform where guards could watch for enemies. Patrols of soldiers walked along the wall so often that they created a path. Today that path is known as Wall Street.

. . . On October 4th, 1658 in New Amsterdam, the first police force was organized. These policemen were also firemen as a part of their job. Payment for their service was twenty-four stivers (about 48 cents) per each night of duty. Each officer had a musket, sword, and a pistol. He also carried a wooden rattle as a noise maker to arouse [get] the public’s attention in the event of a fire or police action. They also acted as town criers for the time, weather and news. Some of the town people nick-named them “Prowlers” as an expression of their disdain [dislike]. . . .
