Jim Davis has been writing his comic strip, Garfield, for 25 years. It is read by more than 220 million people every day. Davis is also the author of nearly 40 Garfield books.

I grew up on a small cattle farm in Indiana. This meant that I was always around dust, fur, and crops. That might have been fine for most kids, but not for me—I had asthma. All those things made it hard for me to breathe.

Back then, there wasn’t good medicine for asthma. When I got sick, I’d have to stay in bed for a few days. Being cooped up became boring, so I’d use my imagination to escape.

I started drawing as a way to entertain myself. I drew our cats, the cattle, the dog, and whatever was around me. My first pictures were pretty bad, but my mom liked them, so I kept drawing. The pencil became an extension of my arm and my imagination.

Later, drawing became a form of communication for me. At my little country school, I was a shy kid who would be off to the side, daydreaming or watching others. In first and second grade, I stuttered and rarely spoke to classmates. But my teachers were wonderful. They knew I loved to draw, so they’d always choose me to make signs and posters for the classroom.

Every chance I had, I would draw. I doodled on the corners of my notebooks and carved pictures in the frost on the windowpanes.

I was also a devoted reader of comic strips. My favorites were Peanuts, Beetle Bailey, Henry, and Steve Canyon. I liked the characters, and I loved the gags. When I was in fifth grade, I started adding captions to my own drawings. I liked to draw my brother saying goofy things.

As I got older, I began to take art more seriously. I checked out some “Learn to Draw” books from the library, and I took a correspondence course in drawing.

After college, I became an assistant to the creator of the Tumbleweeds comic strip. Then I started my own strip, Gnorm Gnat. But my editors said, “Who wants to read about bugs?” I realized that there were hardly any comics about cats, so in 1978 I created Garfield.

Although my family had always had a barn full of cats, there was never one quite like Garfield. Garfield is a little bit of our cats, me, my dad, and other people I’ve known. But mostly, Garfield comes from my imagination.

As a kid, I never dreamed I’d become a cartoonist. But all those flights of fancy I took as a little boy have served me well in my life as an artist.
